Active listening requires concentration and a conscious effort to achieve. The purpose of active listening is to listen to understand, not just hear what was said. Active listening requires practice to become better and more efficient at doing it. The resource person dealt with the following components of active listening as part of effective listening skills: Eye contact, Non-verbal language, Verbal nods, Paraphrasing, Asking questions and Positive language. At the end of the session the students actively participated in the mock session to check their ability to listen effectively following the guidelines from the resource person. On the whole the seminar stood out to fruitful fun for the students.
